Future Role of Special Schools and Special Classes in Ireland which has References to the EPSN Act that may be useful for your school's admissions policy:

The Education for Persons with Special Educational Needs (EPSEN) Act, 2004 states that a child with special educational needs shall be educated in an inclusive environment with children who do not have such needs unless the nature or degree of those needs is such that to do so would be inconsistent with the best interests of the child (p6)

In the future, the pupils enrolled in special schools will be those for whom it has been decided that it is in their best interests to receive their education in a setting separate from children who do not have special educational needs (in accordance with Section 2 of the EPSN Act, 2004). It is to be expected that pupils in special schools will therefore have complex special educational needs and that their schools will require teachers with specialist knowledge and skills in order to provide appropriate education for their pupils. Children in special classes will also have needs to the extent that they cannot be educated in mainstream settings for some or all of the day. (p103)

Schools should be allowed to continue to operate informal dual placement arrangements as currently these do not have resource implications for the State. These informal arrangements should be subject to the agreement of parents and pupils and the appropriate planning and monitoring of arrangements until such time as more evidence becomes available concerning the outcomes of dual enrolment for children with special educational needs. (p111)

There is a discussion on pp64-65 of the NCSE publication which acknowledges the expansion of enrolment beyond special schools' original designations to accommodate children who could not be accommodated in mainstream schools. This is reflected in the NCSE's resourcing of Special Schools, which is by diagnosis of the cohort of children rather than by school designation.
